

Republicans won't be the only ones suffering through four years of Al Gore.

If you think Al Gore is an environmentalist, think again. First he was caught in a secret White House memo supporting commercial whaling. Now he's pushing a government program that will kill millions of birds, fish, rabbits and other animals in useless and painful experiments. All to show that substances like turpentine and rat poison are toxic. It's called the "high production volume (HPV) chemical testing program." It may sound like something to vote for but it's really just bad news for the environment, the animals and the public health. Animal tests are so unreliable they can actually clear chemicals we already know to be harmful to humans. Or, when animals die, companies can claim the results don't apply. Either way, government action will be delayed for years. Modern, reliable, non-animal tests are available but are being ignored. The HPV program is seriously flawed. It ignores existing information on toxic chemicals and uses 1930's technology to solve 21st century problems. Please help us change Mr. Gore's mind.
